The Risks Of Dating A Coworker Without Reading This Guide First

- You might get transferred to another department
 - You might get fired
 - You might get demoted
 - You might get charged with sexual harassment
 - You might get a bad reputation in the workplace
 - And other crap you might not want to deal with at this point

Signs A Female Coworker Likes You

- She looks at you first in a group. For instance, if someone in a group tells a joke and everyone laughs, she glances at you. It's like she secretly cares what you think.
 - She hints to you about wanting something she can't get.
 - She shares gossip about you and her. For instance, if her friends at Accounting keeps asking if you're a couple - and she tells you this.
 - She asks you - only you, and no one else - about your weekend.
 - She tells you about her family and friends.
 - She asks you about YOUR family and friends. Or at least, she asks about your current living arrangements.

What To Do When A Coworker Likes You

- I strongly advise against having a one-night stand with her. Your workplace is your social circle, and if you jump-and-dump her, everyone will hate you.
 - I strongly suggest you only date her if you want to become exclusive with her. Your workplace social circle will love you.
 - If you're after one-night stands only, only try it with women you do NOT work with.

How To Date A Coworker

- Keep it a secret. Don't tell anyone, don't show off, don't make bets with the guys. Everything should be between you and her.
 - Make her feel like she's chasing you. Don't "court" her. Until you're officially a couple, always conceal your intentions.
 - Flirt on and off. Don't flirt on and on. Flirt lightly, then get back to work. Flirt again, then continue working. Keep this up until you find an opportunity to ask her out.
 - Go one on one. Don't go on group dates - it should only be you and her alone.
 - Jump between romantic and platonic topics. In your conversations with her, alternate between non-romantic and romantic topics. Slowly escalate the romantic intensity as you go along. Before long, she'll fall in love with you.

Asking a female coworker out is tricky. If you directly ask her out, everyone will find out and she'll most likely decline. If you pussyfoot your way around it, she won't notice your invitation. She might even feel turned-off by your weak, insecure manner.

This is where "Multiple-Outs" come in.

Multiple-Outs are questions you ask her that, whether she answers "Yes" or "No," you'd be right.

This is important: When she sees you as being "right," she's psychologically much more likely to comply with you.

The formula for Multiple-Outs is this:

"It's not ____, is it?"

Here's a good workplace example. You can ask her:
"You're not going to the bar after work, are you?"

Turn the page.

If she says “Yes,” you can then say: “Same here. I’ll see you there.”

If she says “No,” you can then say: “I thought so. Where you headed, then?”

Compare this Multiple-Out to the indirect question: “Are you going to the bar after work?” or the direct invitation: “Let’s go to the bar after work.”

With these alternatives, she can say “No,” and any follow-up you make after that will sound needy.

Multiple-Outs are great ways to ensure a one-on-one date with her. Prepare your Multiple-Outs in advance, then deliver an appropriate one when she’s in a good mood.
